“ I shared this on Facebook a couple of years ago, but thought of this story today: My Aunt Winnifred and Aunt Bea reminisced to my sister (Judy Vance) about school days in the 1920s, and Judy left notes about this story. It seems that my Grandpa Fred Vance was in charge of declaring snow days at the Cass Bridge School in Bridgeport, but Winnifred and Bea remembered he rarely called snow days. They usually walked about a mile to the school everyday, but if the weather was bad Fred would hitch up the wagon to a horse and take them to school. If the snow was too deep for the horse to get through, Fred would back up the horse and say, "Well, no school today" and take them all back home. I can only imagine how deep the snow must have been for a horse not to be able to get through!!! But Winnifred's memory really says it all: there weren't very many snow days at all. RIP Aunt Winnifred. Diana Vance Nicholas.
